Embalming Dead Soldiers for Shipment.

EDITOR NATIONAL TRIBUNE: Some time ago comrade, in a communication to THE NATIONAL TRIBUNE, requested some one to write about burying the dead after a battle. I never had any experience in that direction while I was a soldier, but an incident came under my observation that may be of interest to the comrade.

At the time of the battle of Cedar Creek, Oct.

Feb. 1864, my regiment was doing guard duty at Martinsburg, W. Va. The Sunday afternoon

Of all the metaphors, that which calls Oxygen "Nature's Kindly Breath," is the most apt. It is indeed the kindly part of Nature's breath. Observe the result of this bountiful respiration: Hon. P. H. Jacobs, the well-known chemist, says:

We held our position here until 3:30 p. m., when Gordon's flank movement compelled us to retire. My company got into the action with 62 men in ranks, and the loss was 32 in killed, wounded and missing—the latter mostly prisoners.—W. L. GARDNER, Co. K, 110th Ohio, Olga, O.

Jack Frost helped us out. Previous to our going to Rocky Run we were stationed at Fortotten, and I witnessed that military murder the comrade speaks about. It was on a Sunday morning, one of the finest I ever saw. I was sergeant of the guard in the fort, and I stood on the parapet of the fort and saw those men marching out behind their own coffins. All the troops in the city witnessed the tragedy. There were three sides of a hollow square formed by the troops, while the prisoners and firing parties made the fourth side. Behind this that the troops were all marched past the bodies just as they had fallen, so that each and every man could see and take warning. The men were sentenced for bounty jumping and desertion. If I recollect, and at the time of their execution, I am one of the ones told Maj. Lawson that he had jumped 28 bounties. I would like very much to hear from some of my old comrades of the 14th N. Y.
